Greetings from the Seneschal

Greetings to All!!!

Poorman's is right around the corner! Yay! Tell everybody you know to come on down and check us out that Saturday. It should be lots of fun and lots of work. Many hands make the work load small, so please help where ever you can! We especially need troll help, set up help, and tear down help. These are three areas that generally get handed to a happy few. It'd be really great if those few got a chance to enjoy the event as well. So please, sign up for an hour at troll...police your camping area really well and if you see someone needing help...don't hesitate. :)

We need to start contemplating new areas for Monday night practice indoors. Mind you, these are just back ups in case the university doesn't work out. So just keep that in mind when you go places and please mention it to an officer or at a moot...I will start compiling a list of alternatives. We need 10 foot ceilings and lots of space.

Check out your local rec centers and clubs and churches...do they have anything that will suit our needs?

Til next time :)

Arianna

Saludos hasta el folk de la Comarca de la Falcon's Keep (Greetings unto the folk of the Shire of Falcon's Keep)

The anticipation is growing steadily as the day nears for Poorman's Pennsic. The worries also grow... Will the weather be good? Will many people attend? Will we be able to do what we set out to do?

While I cannot speak for the first two, I can speak of the last: many hands make for small work. Lending a helping hand will not only make things run more smoothly, it will make the event more fun for everyone. You might just learn something too. Even the "smallest" of tasks might bring future rewards.

Above all, however: have fun yourself! Try something new, or hone an established skill. Get that thing that keeps bringing you back to Merchant's Row; talk to that old friend that finally came out to Poorman's for the first time. All of these things will make this year's Poorman's the best one ...yet.

Atentamente en el Servicio,
(yours in service)
Pedro de Benavides

Cover Story:

Sachsenspiegel, showing the German Ostsiedlung.
(detail)

Upper part: the locator (with a special hat) receives the foundation charter from the landlord. The settlers clear the forest and build houses. Lower part: the locator acts as the judge in the village.

The Sachsenspiegel is a compilation of German law translated into Low German @1220 C.E. It was among the first books to be written in German, and the working law in some parts of Germany until 1900.

The Ostsiedlung, literally "settlement in the east", was a period of German expansion to eastern Europe from approximately 1100–1350. The affected area roughly stretched from Slovenia to Estonia, and eastwards into Transylvania. The Black Death stopped the major settlement; however, Germans did continue to move east in smaller numbers for several centuries afterward.

Plates, Platters, Trenchers and other Feast Gear

Many folk in the SCA take pride in collecting a set of pretty feast gear which usually includes a plate, bowl, cup, knife, fork and spoon. Is this what they really did in the middle ages? Obviously, the answer may depend on the time and place; but there are some generalities for medieval Europe.

While artwork often shows splendidly set tables with many serving dishes, including round, oval and square shapes, and materials ranging from wood to ceramic and metal, there is much less information about place settings for the average person. This is because, until the Renaissance, individual place settings were unusual. Except for the wealthy, most people probably lived on dishes that were slowly cooked over the fire- soups, stews and porridge- which they most likely ate from wooden bowls. They sat wherever they could find space since houses were small, families large, and furniture often insufficient for everyone to have their own chair at a table. This explains why the turner in Viking York was making bowls rather than plates and the wooden dishes from most of medieval Europe are mostly bowls.

Flat loaves of trencher bread are documented, but it is not clear if these were placed on an underlying dish. Only a few wood trenchers have been discovered and these were from the Elizabethan private collections.

The few examples of medieval plates may have been serving dishes. Treatises on manners make it clear that, even in wealthy households, adjacent diners shared dishes (as described in books of etiquette), and cupbearers brought a filled cup, from which the thirsty diner drank before returning it to the cup bearer to be refilled or taken to the next person who signaled the cupbearer.

Inventories of wealthy households in the late middle ages make it clear that serving dishes and spoons were abundant while the numbers of drinking vessels and knives were much less than the number of individuals served. Most recipes call for cutting food up before serving so individual knives were not essential, but may have been brought by individual diners and used not only to cut up larger pieces of food but also to take food from a common platter and/or to carry it to the mouth.

Forks were only used in the kitchen until the Renaissance, when they were introduced in Italy as a novel way to eat without soiling fingers and clothing. By the Elizabethan period ceramics were prominent, and individual places were being set at the table.

The final course was a “banquet” of dessert specialties often served outside in a tent on the lawn using special small plates. There are even recipes for a sotelye in which the plates are made of gum paste painted to resemble ceramic.
